Gen Y Students Getting More Z's Now Could Be in for a Rude Workplace Wake-Up Call

Generational consultants available for commentary on late-start school program

Many students in the GTA may be welcoming the news that they may soon have a late-start program in place at their school. But generational consultants from n-gen, say that an altered schedule may make it even more difficult for students to adjust to the 'typical' 9 to 5 day once they enter the workforce.

n-gen works with Canada's business managers to deal with today's four-generation work-force, which contains the most diverse range of attitudes and expectations ever seen.

According to n-gen co-founders, Giselle Kovary and Adwoa Buahene, new graduates entering the workforce are often faced with a number of harsh realities - and an alarm clock going off before sunrise is just one of them.

Ask them:

- What companies can be doing to better orient new employees – particularly Gen Y's to their company to ensure an easy transition into the working world.
- Why such a policy might create an even bigger disconnect between younger workers and their more traditional supervisors.
